Scholarships take women leaders to top business schools

Chief Executive Women (CEW) today announced the launch of its annual scholarship program for Australian women to take their careers to the next level.

The 2017 CEW Scholars Program will allow 17 talented women to attend internationally acclaimed business schools such as Harvard Business School, The Wharton School, MIT, INSEAD, and AGSM@UNSW.

CEW President Kathryn Fagg said Australia must get a critical mass of women in leadership roles to realise the benefits we know that diversity can deliver.

“We need more women in the C-suite where they can be instrumental in running our businesses and leading our organisations.

“CEW’s scholarship program provides women executives with the skills, networks and confidence to help them take the necessary steps towards the top job.

“Reflecting the increasingly uncertain economic landscape, our 2017 program includes two new programs centered around innovation. These scholarships are designed to offer women the skills and resilience to achieve greater career success in a disruptive environment” said Kathryn Fagg, President Chief Executive Women.

New awards focus on innovation

In recognition of the growing focus on disruption and innovation in business today, the 2017 CEW Scholars program introduces scholarships to two new courses: Driving Strategic Innovation at MIT Sloan offered jointly with IMD and Disruptive Innovation at Harvard Business School.

Disruptive Innovation is offered jointly with Austrade and is aimed at Australian women executives working at organisations engaged in exporting as a core function of their business.

Another new award in 2017, Harvard Business School’s Authentic Leadership Development, emphasises the importance of executives identifying and strengthening their core leadership skills.

In addition, in 2017 CEW scholarship applicants will be considered for one of four places at the mid-year Harvard Club Leaders Program local course – Digital Innovation and Transformation: the New Imperative for Organisational Success in the 21st Century.
