

Chief Executive Women supporting women in the arts

For immediate release

18 November 2013: Chief Executive Women, in partnership with the Nelson Meers Foundation and Creative Partnerships Australia, are delighted to acknowledge Rebecca MacFarling of Musica Viva Australia as a top female talent from the arts sector, awarding her a scholarship to attend the Leading for Results program at the prestigious INSEAD business school in Singapore.

Rebecca is the third woman from the arts that CEW, Nelson Meers Foundation and Creative Partnerships Australia have sponsored to participate in executive education programs in 2013. In May, Skye O'Meara, manager of Tjala Arts Centre in South Australia, and Anna Reece, General Manager of the Darwin Festival, were sponsored to attend leadership development programs at Mount Eliza Business School, which forms the executive education arm of the Melbourne Business School.

Rebecca is the Director of Sales and Marketing at Musica Viva, the largest presenter of chamber music in the world. In her role Rebecca has driven the sales of the company's concerts, as well as music education programs which reach 30,000 Australian children annually.

CEW President Christine Christian said:

"The underrepresentation of women in leadership in the Arts sector reveals much about the dire nature of gender diversity generally in Australian organisations. It's a shocking fact that only 16.7% of CEOs in the arts sector are female, despite women making up 50% of the industry workforce. Clearly, gender diversity remains as much a problem in the arts as it does in other industries."

Fiona Menzies, CEO of Creative Partnerships Australia, commented: "The arts sector is filled with talented women, but they're not getting to the top. It's clear that when it comes to reaching leadership positions, women in the arts face as many hurdles as women in other industries. We hope that programs like the ones we've sponsored this year can help women aspiring to leadership positions overcome some of these barriers".
